This is the future of proprietary operating systems like Windows, macOS and iOS as their parent companies move towards services and subscription models. More and more, they'll use their operating systems to push their services and subscriptions, to the detriment of the user experience. It's been happening in Windows 10 for a few years now, and iOS, too, is riddled with ads for Apple's services.

The photo gallery on the page is mostly the same screenshot with a different desktop background, and by the looks of things, it indeed appears to be a Windows 10 theme with flat icons.

Sounds too good to be true? Well it might not surprise you to hear that this isn't an official Microsoft product, rather it's a version of Linux Lite 4.8 LTS with Windows 10 wallpaper and flat icons.

The official website looks like something out of the nineties, which makes the line that says "You have all the tools now for designing really good websites" even more entertaining.

Windows 12 Lite isn't available to download from the website, but you can buy it for £15 on DVD. You really shouldn't though.
