Ubuntu is making a server version of its Linux distribution. Up until now, the company has been best known for its easy-to-use desktop OS.

In a recent interview, Ubuntu server maintainer Fabio Massimo Di Nitto said that there was little reason not to make a server distro, simply because so many of the components would be common between it and the established desktop version.

"The first thing of note is that all Ubuntu-offered software comes from one repository. There are no desktop and server-specific repositories," he said.
